I am thrilled with the opportunity to serve WFRN in a more substantial capacity, and work to continue the tremendous contributions WFRN has made to public policy discourse, organizational practices, and academia. When I joined WFRN in 2011, my research focused on what organizational resources help employees manage work and family responsibilities, resulting in several publications providing links among trainable family-supportive supervisor behaviors with employee well-being, work-family enrichment, and job performance. From there, my interests have grown into understanding the work-family experiences of financially insecure employees, and in particular how their health is affected by their work-family experiences. My colleagues and I have recently published two papers linking financial insecurity to work-family conflict, work-family balance, stress, and subsequent health symptoms. I am hopeful that a position on the Executive Committee will allow for new contributions in the form of service to an organization vital to workers, their families, and communities.
