In a turbulent, unequal world, difficulties in navigating two central life spheres - work and family - have become increasingly laid bare. The WFRN community has a central role in building scholarship that fosters work-family equity, and as President I will lead with a justice lens. I have been committed to WFRN for many years, since participating in the Inaugural Program Committee and most recently serving on the Executive Board. I would be honored to serve as WFRN President. Both my research program and leadership roles have prepared me to serve in this role. As Professor of Sociology at University of Toronto, my research focuses on gender, culture, work-family intersections, and health, examining 1) links between stressors like parenting strains and work-family conflicts and well-being, and 2) meanings and experiences of family and work time. As Department Chair, I have built structures to support graduate students, guided anti-racism efforts, and promoted excellence in scholarly work. As WFRN President, I will deepen WFRN’s scholarship, mentoring and outreach work and support scholars across the globe whose research can foster equitable work-family policies and practices in a changing world. Specifically, I will work with the WFRN executive team and our members to 1) grow our vibrant intellectual community through conferences and other scholarly connections; 2) enrich mentoring of junior faculty, postdocs and graduate students, especially those from underrepresented groups and 3) promote connections to policy, non-profit, and community organizations to share and extend knowledge on equitable and just work-family policies and practices.
